Where We Are Now

- GBV is a global health problem mainly perpetrated against women of all ages from every society.
- Many nurses lack adequate knowledge in reacting to and identifying gender-based violence.
- However, nurses can play an essential role in the identification, management and prevention of GBV
- Several studies have identified the lack of GBV educational strategies as being a problem, for undergraduate nurses (Doran & Hutchinson, 2017; Valpied, Aprico, Clewett, & Hegarty, 2017).

The Quint, 2016

Aims & Objectives

- To gain a comprehensive understanding of undergraduate nursing student perceptions and understanding of GBV and employ the findings to inform undergraduate curriculum development.

Proposed Methodology

- Mixed Methods Approach - quantitative data collection (via questionnaire) followed by qualitative interviews with participants.

Relevance to clinical practice

- Continued effort is required to address GBV in undergraduate nursing education so that nursing graduates understand the association between violence exposure and poor health and can assess for GBV and respond appropriately in the clinical environment.
