Student Success: Adding Value through 'Learning Gain'

Aim of presentation

- To share my experiences of attempting to engage reluctant readers
- To explore your experiences
- To suggest ways to understand and overcome this reluctance

Mark Smith (2012) suggests that ‘... a good way of exploring pedagogy is as the process of accompanying learners; caring for and about them; and bringing learning into life.’

So in that spirit...

If you're sitting comfortably, I will begin...

“I’ve only ever finished one book in my life. It was the last Harry Potter – and I only read it ‘cos I wanted to know what happened, and I didn’t want to wait for the film to come out to find out...”

I look at the student as she speaks, and wonder how she has made it into the third year of a degree course....

Explore your experiences...

Consider your own experiences in teaching :-

- Have you encountered similar challenges?
- How have you addressed them?

Discuss these with the person next to you :-

- Are there any common themes?
- How does this contribute to learning gain?
For example, through improvement in knowledge, skills, work-readiness and personal development.

Share these with the rest of the group.

Ways to understand & overcome reluctance...

- Recognising difference – not everyone likes reading – however we need to engage with literature in order to learn
- Identifying a topic starting point, based on what students do enjoy for example :
 - Watching films, video clips
 - Fiction, poetry, music
- Reading together, for example:
 - Book clubs
 - Journal clubs
 - Unpicking an article together in a session
 - Collaborating on a topic – each find and contribute an article

Methods I plan to try next...

Pictures

Critiquing picture books for young people and adults
- designing own versions

Writing

Writing stories – fiction and creative non-fiction

Bringing learning to life

Incorporating educational visits into assessed course work

Revisiting the start...

Once more, I am reminded of Smith words '... a good way of exploring pedagogy is as the process of accompanying learners; caring for and about them; and bringing learning into life.'

We can do this by:

- Being responsive
- Being supportive
- Caring for and about students
- Being honest and (when needed) firm
- Collaborating with colleagues to provide cohesive support

To continue the conversation...

Please contact me if you:

- Are interested in helping me to explore this further;
- Have other ideas for me to consider;
- Want to know more about my research.
